DANCE DATE

OSSIE clenched his teeth, clutched the car door securely, turned to Sandy as she gripped the wheel and muttered, "Contact." He then closed his eyes. Undaunted, Sandy jammed her foot down on the accelerator and the jalopy roared forward.

Twenty minutes later, shaken Ossie assisted his favorite girl out of his much loved car and together they entered the soda shop. Sandy immediately joined a group of girls at a booth and explained in loud tones that she had finally convinced Ossie that he should teach her to drive his car. "And," she continued, "we're going to the Spring Hop over in Beltsville tonight and Ossie said I could drive." The girls clucked enviously.

Ossie groaned. He sat at the counter with his buddy, Budge Thomas. Budge raised an eyebrow. "Was that an accurate account I just heard?" Ossie turned to him. "What'll I do, Budge? Sandy's wrecking my jalopy. She's planning on this dance tonight and I haven't got a copper outside of soda money. Besides, she's a menace behind the wheel." He sat glumly. "Also, I'm a heel. I asked her to go to that dance to keep her from dating Dave Martin." Budge looked wise. "Hmm, maybe you'd have done better to let Martin date her. She could drive that slick foreign bus of his and he'd be off her for life."

This did not cheer Ossie. Sandy joined them a few moments later and chattered animatedly about her driving and the evening ahead. Budge listened with seeming interest and when she turned to greet another girl friend, he tapped Ossie on the arm. "I got a foolproof plot, pal, listen . . ." he leaned closer, "I'll slip out and detach the distributor rotor. You get Sandy to drive home. When the car doesn't start, we can look at the motor and pronounce a catastrophe. I'll run down to Gasser's garage at the corner for a franistanis and come back saying they're all out of the part and won't be able to get it for weeks. That way you'll get out of teaching her to drive and going to the dance and she'll feel guilty about lousing up your auto."

Ossie brightened visibly and minutes later, he and Sandy left. All worked as Budge had planned it. In desperation Ossie called him from the soda shop. Together they shook their heads as they studied the motor. "Oh, Ossie," said Sandy desperately, "I've simply ruined your car." Ossie felt the pangs of conscience and as he was about to weaken, Budge spoke up. "I'll check with Gasser's and see if they have a franistanis. But it doesn't look good. This is an old car, Ossie and . . ." with which he departed.

Ossie was still looking at the motor as worried Sandy stood by when Dave Martin cruised up in his low, red car. "What's perkin', Ossie? Did that heap finally collapse?" Sandy turned to him and poured out the story as she knew it. "And it's all my fault," she said, on the verge of tears. "And Budge doesn't think he can get another franistanis." "A WHAT?" asked Dave. "Well, now," he continued, looking wise, "maybe I can find the trouble."

Budge walked up at this point, explaining that the necessary part was not available. . . . Ossie signalled him to be quiet as Dave Martin calmly attached the rotor to the distributor, explaining it all to a wide-eyed Sandy as he worked. "So you see, Sandy sweet, you've had a snow job without precedent from these two jokers. Now why not chuck 'em and join me for the Beltsville Hop. I'll let you drive my car and the franistanis will stay attached, believe me."

Sandy turned a furious glare on Ossie and Budge as she stepped into Dave's car. "You two are . . . are lower than a snake's vest pocket," she fumed. As the car roared away, Ossie turned to Budge. "Ya know, that's mighty low." "Cheer up," yukked Budge. "You've still got your car."

Then, in silence, they heard the final sizzle of air as it left the right rear tire!
